

General information on tractive power and fuel consumption

Poor tractive power

1200112000

Poor tractive power in combination with "normal fuel consumption" may be due to several causes. If no external symptoms are displayed, you should check the fuel, air, exhaust system, compression, the mechanical parts of the engine, and the engine control system.

Basic conditions for achieving the correct tractive power

The following conditions should be met in order for the engine to yield the right tractive power:

- Access to the right amount of energy via the fuel each time there is injection
- Access to the right amount of air
- The engine should emit exhaust gases without any hindrance
- The engine should be in a mechanically fault-free condition
- The ignition temperature is sufficiently high in the cylinders
- The engine control system, including sensors, should be free from faults

Fuel

If the engine is supplied with too little fuel or fuel of a poor grade, this will have a negative effect on the tractive power.

Environmental diesel fuels also have a negative effect on tractive power.

A condition for achieving specified tractive power is that the feed pressure on the low pressure side is sufficiently high.

The pressure level and measuring method are described in the Service Information under Groups 20 and 23.

The following items make it less possible to achieve the right amount of fuel injected:

- Steam lock in the fuel system
- Clogged fuel filter
- Faulty overflow valve
- Clog strainer in the fuel tank
- Worn or faulty feed pump
- Air leakage
- Squeezed fuel line from the tank
- Clogged air line to the tank
- Impurities in the fuel
- Poor fuel grade
