

OVERVIEW

Changes in American politics have been accompanied by—and influenced by—changes in the mass media. The rise of strong national political party organizations was facilitated by the emergence of mass-circulation daily newspapers. Political reform movements depended in part on the development of national magazines catering to middle-class opinion. The weakening of political parties was accelerated by the ability of candidates to speak directly to constituents via radio and television.

The role of journalists in a democratic society poses an inevitable dilemma: If they are to serve well as information gatherers, gatekeepers, scorekeepers, and watchdogs, they must be free of government controls. But to the extent that they are free of such controls, they are also free to act in their own political or economic interests. In the United States, a competitive press largely free of government controls has contributed to a substantial diversity of opinion and a general (though not unanimous) commitment to the goal of fairness in news reporting. The national media are in general more liberal than the local media, but the extent to which a reporter's beliefs affect reporting varies greatly with the kind of story—routine, feature, or insider.

CHAPTER OUTLINE

I. Introduction

- Television and the Internet are key parts of the New Media; newspapers and magazines are part of the Old Media. And when it comes to politics, the New Media are getting stronger and the Old Media are getting weaker.

II. The Media and Politics

- America has had a long tradition of privately owned media
- Although newspapers require no government permission to operate, radio and television do.
  - Licenses must be periodically renewed through the Federal Communication Commission.
- There are two potential limits to the freedom of privately owned newspapers and broadcast stations:
  - they must make a profit and
  - media bias.

III. Journalism in American Political History (THEME A: THE HISTORY AND STRUCTURE OF THE NEWS MEDIA IN THE UNITED STATES)

- Changing media technology
  - New Media: television, Internet; Old Media: newspapers, magazines
    - The New Media that are challenging the Old Media
      - ≡ More television viewers than newspaper readers
      - ≡ More people read Web log (blog) postings than read magazine articles
      - ≡ Bloggers showed evidence that CBS documents incriminating President George W. Bush were forgeries
      - ≡ In 2008, 80 percent of those between the ages of eighteen and twenty-nine used the Internet. Fifty percent of that group used it to get news about the election and participate in the process. Internet is the primary source as news. Only one-third of young people read newspapers.
