- List the steps involved in developing a measure
- Explain the essential psychometric properties and item characteristics that need to be investigated when developing a measure
- Explain what a test manual should contain
- Explain how to evaluate a measure.

INTRODUCTION

- At a minimum, it takes three to five years to develop a measure from the point at which the idea is conceived to the moment when the measure is published and becomes available to the consumer.
- In-depth, advanced psychometric knowledge and test development expertise is required by those who initiate and guide the development process.
- The main purpose of this chapter is to enable you to evaluate the technical quality of a measure and the information found in a test manual

Steps in Developing a Psychological Measure

Here's a breakdown of the key steps:

1. The Planning Phase (Blueprinting the Measure)

This is where you define the purpose and characteristics of your measure. Here are some important aspects to consider:

- Aim: Why are you creating this measure? What psychological construct (e.g., anxiety, intelligence) are you trying to assess?
- Target Population: Who will be taking this measure (e.g., children, adults, a specific cultural group)?
- Use: How will the results be used? Screening, diagnosis, selection purposes?
- Type of Measure:
- Normative vs. Criterion-Referenced: Does it compare someone to a general population (normative) or a specific standard (criterion)?
