

Assignment A is called a project proposal. In research science this is a document that is presented before receiving funding and undertaking research in a given field. It is a realistic working plan justifying the reasoning behind why time and money should be spent on that particular research and what is hoped to be achieved/ gained (Goals). The proposal starts off with an abstract which is like the blurb of a book except that it contains scientific terminology and is about research. It then introduces the general background on the topic in an introduction followed by an analysis of current research (lit review) in the field. This will tell the grant providers what information is currently out there and what the project aims to uncover (gaps in research) and explore. It then follows to evaluate the best methodologies used to carry out previous research and analyse their results (Methodology). A justification of the chosen method for the current proposal is given based on the discussions. The whole proposal flows well as each section is introduced by the preceding one where necessary.
