These findings have important implications for the design of training programs. First, they indicate that training programs should be designed to address the specific needs of the target population. For example, training programs for older adults should focus on improving their cognitive and physical abilities, while training programs for younger adults should focus on improving their social and emotional abilities. Second, the findings suggest that training programs should be designed to be interactive and engaging. This can be achieved by using a variety of training methods, such as role playing, group exercises, and self-reflection. Third, the findings suggest that training programs should be designed to be ongoing and continuous. This can be achieved by providing ongoing support and feedback to participants, and by encouraging them to continue their learning beyond the training program.

Strong management is bound to be effective, increasingly, thanks to increasingly sophisticated online targeting, coverage and personalisation options available. It will be required on employment at National scale too, though. They will be doing useful & responsible work, period, and that's all that counts. If you believe a deficit in motivation, self-actualisation or autonomy, you've got something wrong with the system, not the man.
