

Variation Notes

Variations, in biology, any difference between cells, individual organisms, or groups of organisms of any species caused either by genetic differences (genotypic variation) or by the effect of environmental factors on the expression of the genetic potential (phenotypic variation).

Variation describes diversity in the genetic make-up of a species.

Variation arises from mutations.

Variation describes diversity in the genetic make-up of a species.

Variations usually have a small effect on phenotype (continuous variation), but there are examples where a variant has a large effect on a phenotype, and generates distinct categories (discontinuous variation).

Variation in a population can be influenced by mutation rate, genetic drift, sexual reproduction, meiosis and gene flow.

Environmental variation is variation due to the environment, e.g. scars, tattoos. Twins demonstrate this because their genes are identical, but they do not always look the same. In plants the environmental factor plays a much bigger role.

Genetic Variation: Allele frequency

Genetic variation is usually expressed as a relative frequency, which means a proportion of the total population under study. In other words, a relative frequency value represents the percentage of a given phenotype, genotype, or allele within a population.

Genetic Variation: Mutations

Mutation is a change in DNA, the hereditary material of life. An organism's DNA affects how it looks, how it behaves, and its physiology — all aspects of its life. So a change in an organism's DNA can cause changes in all aspects of its life.

Genetic Variation: Meiosis

Meiosis is the process by which most eukaryotic organisms, those with cells having an organized nucleus, produces sex cells, the male and female gametes.

Genetic Variation: Sexual Reproduction

Sexual reproduction produces offspring that resemble their parents, but are not identical to them. Asexual reproduction produces offspring - clones - which are genetically identical to their parents.

Gene flow

Gene flow is the movement of genes from one population to another. This occurs in plants when they send their pollen by wind (or it is carried by insects) to pollinate other populations some distance away, or in animals when individuals travel from one geographic location to another.
