

Evidence of Plate Tectonics

The theory of plate tectonics says that Earth's crust and the uppermost part of the mantle are broken up into pieces called tectonic plates. The breaks between plates are called plate boundaries. Plate boundaries are classified by the way the plates are moving relative to each other. The movement of plates is responsible for the formation of a number of different structures.

An oceanic ridge is formed at a divergent boundary, when two plates are moving away from each other. Magma rises to fill the gap created from the separating plates, which creates new crust.

An oceanic trench is formed at a convergent boundary between two plates, when one plate subducts (or dives) beneath the other. Unlike a divergent boundary where new crust is created, a convergent boundary is where old crust is destroyed as the plate subducts into the hot mantle. Often, volcanoes form on the other plate as a result of this subduction.

Transform boundaries are places where plates slide past each other. Crust is neither created nor destroyed at transform boundaries, but the movement of plates at these types of boundaries can cause earthquakes.

Answer the questions below to learn more about the evidence that supports the theory of plate tectonics.

1. Based on the theory of plate tectonics, would you expect to find very new rock or very old rock at an oceanic ridge? Explain why.

2. Based on the theory of plate tectonics, would you expect to find very new rock or very old rock in an oceanic trench? Explain why.

3. In the Pacific Ocean, there is a plate boundary between two tectonic plates: the Pacific Plate, which contains some of the oldest oceanic crust on Earth, and the Mariana Plate. The Mariana Trench, the deepest oceanic trench on Earth, is located at this boundary. Nearby, there is an arc of volcanic islands called the Mariana Islands. Based on this information, what type of plate boundary is this? How do you know?
