Chinese factors in the *Routledge encyclopedia of narrative theory

<https://doi.org/10.1515/css-2022-2078>

Abstract: The Routledge encyclopedia of narrative theory is the first encyclopedia of narrative theory in the world to reference the practices of the Chinese narrative tradition and theory. However, the editors have compiled the encyclopedia from the systemic perspective of their knowledge of contemporary Western narratology, focusing on the characteristic differences between contemporary Western narratology and the narrative theories of the so-called ancient non-Western societies. To help overcome this shortcoming, this paper introduces the Chinese narrative tradition from the standpoint of Sinology, attending to the oral/written and history/narrative dichotomies that represent the editors' academic preferences; additionally, it also provides insights into the characteristics of the varied Chinese narrative theories recorded in the encyclopedia from the perspective of contemporary Western narrative theory, and highlights the Chinese contributions to the construction of the knowledge system of narrative theory.

Keywords: Chinese narrative tradition; knowledge system of narrative theory; Sinology; Western narratology

1 Foreword

Storytelling entails the universal human ability of self-expression. Over the course of the evolution of human civilizations, storytelling has evolved in myriad forms in regional and national narrative traditions and thoughts. However, the academic discipline of narratology was formally instituted in France in the 1960s and has since become a globally studied discipline. Currently, there exist three broad academic orientations with respect to "narratology and China." The first orientation approaches the comparative study of Chinese and Western narrative traditions with an emphasis on the conjunction "and," regarding both as self-sufficient knowledge systems such as Dan Shen's "Narratology in China and in the West"
