

A GUIDE TO

LABORATORY EQUIPMENT MAINTENANCE

It's no surprise that lab equipment requires maintenance with all the use it experiences. Our industry experts compiled a guide to laboratory equipment maintenance for reference; read on to learn more.

CLEAN BEFORE AND AFTER USE

Cleaning is the simplest yet most effective step in maintenance and it applies to all equipment, including spectrometers and washers. The good news about cleaning equipment is that it's usually very easy. Routine cleaning can be done by washing lab equipment with soap and water and rinsing it off with purified water.

PROFESSIONAL CALIBRATION

In general, calibration compares the machine's measurements with a standard unit of measurement. If there are consistent deviations from the standard, chances are the data readings are incorrect or inaccurate at the very least. Labs should hire a professional to perform calibration periodically for two primary reasons: bias and data integrity.

REPAIRING AND REPLACING FAULTY PARTS

Even if laboratory technicians follow all the appropriate cleaning and calibration rules, some parts are going to fail over the years of use. The moment equipment begins showing signs of worn-out parts, the lab technician should cease operation. Faulty lab equipment can ruin experiments, provide inaccurate data, and even raise safety concerns.

DOCUMENT EVERYTHING

Anytime lab equipment undergoes a repair or replacement or provides an unusual data reading or strange sound, laboratory staff should document it. The reason documentation is crucial is because it provides insight surrounding the machine's performance.

NEVER SETTLE FOR LOW-QUALITY

Every laboratory knows that quality is crucial in every facet. Labs must produce quality results and data, and they can only do so through quality equipment. That said, it's vital to only supply equipment with top-quality parts. Moreover, the company providing the repair service must value quality as well, otherwise, the service provided might be questionable.
