Access to healthy food and food in general is a privilege, and BIPOC are significantly more likely to experience food insecurity due to a variety of societal factors. Relevant contributing factors might include lack of funding to schools with predominantly BIPOC students, wage gaps and differences in unemployment rates between equally educated and qualified white people and BIPOC, and the presence of food deserts, which are most commonly occupied by BIPOC communities. While obviously just a small part of a much larger solution, by purchasing this book, you'll both receive support on your own personal vegan journey as well as contribute to actual change in solving racial issues within the food industry.
