

Section 3 - Lubrication

ENGINE LUBRICATION SYSTEM

Commercial industrial diesel engines have full pressure lubrication to all main, connecting rod and crankshaft bearings as well as rocker arms and timing gears. Valves are lubricated by overhead oil return.

OIL PUMP

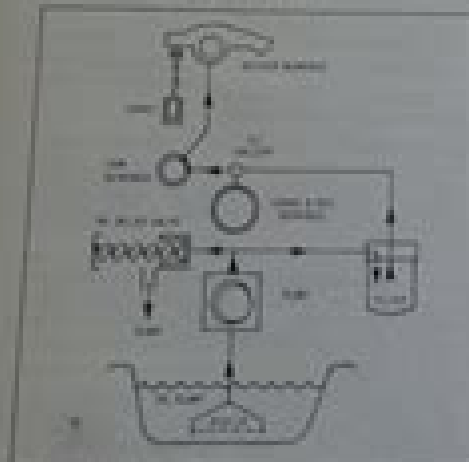

On all engines, a large capacity gerotor type oil pump is driven off the crankshaft and protected by a screened inlet.

A bypass valve maintains suitable oil pressure from idle to maximum speed automatically. Higher oil pressure may be experienced during cold starts.

Refer to page 4 for complete oil pressure figures.

Caution: In the oil pressure it shows in this section, check with the engine rated 1500 RPM and bearing sizes of the model. Refer to engine operating section for the information.

A full flow oil filter is provided to remove dirt and foreign elements from the oil. The removal of grit, sludge and foreign particles causes filter elements to clog and become ineffective unless they are normally replaced every 100 hours or more when if conditions require.

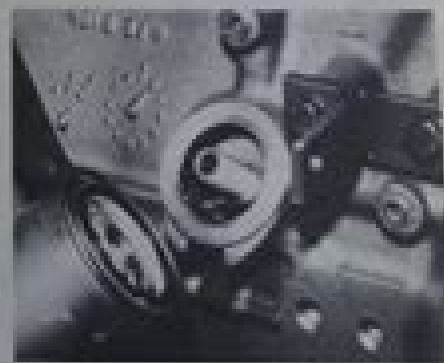

Full-Flow Filter System

Oil Pan (Check Oil Level)

OIL CHANGE FREQUENCY

Engine oil does not "wear out". However, the lubricating oil in internal combustion engines becomes contaminated from the by-products of combustion, dirt, water, unburned fuel entering the cylinders, and the detergents holding the carbon particles in suspension in the crankcase.

Oil Filter

The schedule for changing oil is directly dependent upon the operational environment; an extremely clean operation could go 100 hours while a dirty operation (foundry or cement factory) could be 50 hours or less. (See suggested oil and filter change intervals on page 14.)
