Pros	Cons
<ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>■ Covers all states in the U.S. for over 50 years</li><li>■ Uniform definitions across time and space – this allows for comparisons across locations and time.</li><li>■ Ability to disaggregate the data over different geographic entities (agencies, cities, and states).</li><li>■ Police cannot observe and record all crime that takes place, however police reports are more comprehensive than reports of prosecutions and/or numbers of inmates in prison (not all reports lead to arrests, not all arrests lead to prosecutions, not all prosecutions lead to jail time)</li></ul>	<ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>■ Possibilities of political manipulation of crime statistics</li><li>■ Different interpretations of classifications of crime across agencies</li><li>■ Data missing from entire jurisdictions is extrapolated from jurisdictions with similar populations, could lead to sampling bias. If only a few months of data are reported those figures are used to calculate the statistics for the rest of that year</li><li>■ While offenses reported are conveyed in UCR for Part I crimes, only arrests are reported for Part II crimes, which can be difficult to analyze.</li></ul>
