Implementing the DMA: substantive and procedural principles Alexandre de Streel, Marc Bourreau, Richard Feasey, Amelia Fletcher, Jan Krämer, Giorgio Monti, 2024-01-17 In the dynamic landscape of EU digital platforms regulation we are at a focal point of discussions shaping the future of implementation of the Digital Markets Act arguably one of the most important pieces of legislation of the current times digital policy sphere With the DMA aiming for contestability and fairness in digital markets designated gatekeeper platforms are set to unveil their compliance plans on March 2024 The European Commission in its unique role as an enforcer will lead the work of determining non compliance and ensure that the DMA fulfils its ambitious goals However the success of implementation will depend on the principles on which the new law will be applied This CERRE report recommends that the DMA implementation process should be guided by the substantive principles of effectiveness proportionality non discrimination legal predictability and consistency with other EU laws Furthermore the Commission will have to approach enforcement taking into account the procedural principles of responsive regulation and participation due process and ex ante and ex post evaluation The report then applies those principles to series of specific DMA obligations choice architecture horizontal and vertical interoperability and data related obligations It is also essential to agree on how the Commission gatekeepers and third parties will engage with each other The DMA provides a model of compliance which is not based solely on deterrence instead the gatekeepers are encouraged to and will comply by engaging co operatively with the Commission and third parties However it is still up for question how this principle will be applied what it expects from the stakeholders and how the Commission itself will exercise its deterring powers to enforce compliance On top of it all this CERRE DMA edition is also proposing a set of quantitative measurement indicators so called output indicators each relating to a particular obligation or set of obligations in order to better understand the impact of obligations on the relations between gatekeepers and third parties These quantitative indicators will not represent specific targets or thresholds against which compliance should be assessed They will neither attempt to measure the effect of changes in conduct on market outcomes for users nor more generally competition These quantitative measures will be added to other evidence such as complaints or qualitative representations from affected parties including gatekeepers which the Commission will consider in its compliance assessments This report was written in the framework of a 8 months long multi stakeholder CERRE initiative entitled the DMA Compliance Forum that created a neutral and trusted platform and facilitated dialogue among CERRE members and academics to contribute to the effective and proportionate enforcement of the regulation
