

POPULATION DENSITY AND DISTRIBUTION

Population density is the average number of people per square kilometer in a country or region. Population density is often shown by choropleth maps, the densities are grouped into classes, each of which is colored lighter or darker to reflect lesser or denser density.

Often, areas with high population have high density and those with low population have low density and sparsely populated. At a global scale three major areas of high population density with over 200 people per km² include South East Asia, Bangladesh, China, North east USA and Western Europe and areas with low population density include south east Brazil, the Mexican plateau, California, Canada and Nile valley

Population density = $\frac{\text{population size}}{\text{size of the area}}$ an area has a population of 75 000 and its area is 30000km². Calculate its population density population density = $\frac{75000}{30000}$

Population density = 2.5/km².

Population distribution is the way that the population is spread out over a given area from a small region to the earth as a whole. Population distribution is shown by dot map where the dot represents a given number of people. This maps are easy to use but have disadvantages such as;

- Large number of dots difficult to count and calculate actual figures
- Areas with no dots may give false sense of emptiness

The key to explaining the population distribution is the ability of the area to support the population

The same factors that affect population density also affects population distribution.
