

Chapter 22

Audit of the Capital Acquisition and Repayment Cycle

■ Review Questions

22-1 Four examples of interest bearing liability accounts commonly found on balance sheets are:

1. Notes payable
2. Contracts payable
3. Mortgages payable
4. Bonds payable

These liabilities have the following characteristics in common:

1. Relatively few transactions affect the account balance, but each transaction is often highly material in amount.
2. The exclusion of a single transaction could be material in itself.
3. There is a legal relationship between the client entity and the holder of the stock, bond, or similar ownership document.
4. There is a direct relationship between interest and dividend accounts and debt and equity.

These liabilities differ in what they represent and the nature of their respective liabilities.

22-2 The characteristics of the liability accounts in the capital acquisition and repayment cycle that result in a different auditing approach than the approach followed in the audit of accounts payable are:

1. Relatively few transactions affect the account balance, but each transaction is often highly material in amount.
2. The exclusion of a single transaction could be material in itself.
3. There is a legal relationship between the client entity and the holder of the stock, bond, or similar ownership document.
4. There is a direct relationship between interest and dividend accounts and debt and equity.
