

STRUCTURAL REPAIR MANUAL

INTRODUCTION

Manufacturers publish Structural Repair Manual (SRM) to provide data for the structural maintenance of commercial airplanes which have sustained structural damage. The Manuals are approved by the Aircraft Manufacturers Aviation Authority, for example:

- DGCA (Direction Générale De L'Aviation Civile) ( France)
- FAA (Federal Aviation Administration) ( USA)
- The Structural Repair Manual contains : material identification for structure subject to field repair, typical repairs general applicable to structural components of the airplane that are most likely to be damaged,
- information relative to material substitution, fastener installation,
- airplane alignment check procedure
- and a brief description of procedures that must be performed concurrently with structural repair, such as protective treatment of repair parts and sealing of integral fuel tanks.

Where repairs are not included, it does not follow that the structure concerned is not repairable. Either it has not been found practicable to design a typical repair, or service experience has not yet indicated a requirement.

In some instances, an adequate repair design will require evaluation by the Manufacturer.

Consider the following when typical repairs are not found:

- Accomplish a repair in accordance with the general repair practices and procedures provided in chapter 51 - Structures General - of the manual.

- Preparing a specific repair design for the damage not covered.
- Replacing of the damaged part.

As service experience indicates a requirement, the manual will be revised to include actual, specific repairs to both primary and secondary structures. To ensure consistent handling of these revisions, index categories have been established for all known types of repairs, although some information which falls within these categories will not be released until warranty service experience.

It is intended that, in the event of a major damage, the information included in the manual be supplemented as required by direct liaison with the repair assigned Manufacturer Customer Support Representative.
