BASIC TV CONNECTIONS

ANTENNA OR CABLE TV

See the next page for details on connecting a cable converter box.

ANTENNA A AND B INPUTS

Your TV has two separate ANT(enna)/cable inputs on the back of the set. These two signal inputs offer convenient hookup options for both normal TV program viewing and Picture-In-Picture (PIP) features.

The ANT(enna) "A" input is intended for use and viewing on the TV's main screen. Your home's primary antenna or cable TV signal should be connected to this input for normal TV setup, use, and feature operation.

The PIP ANT(enna) "B" input is a second, or auxiliary, signal source included for your TV's Picture-In-Picture (PIP) feature. For many homes, the use of a single existing antenna or cable TV source for both ANT(enna) "A" and PIP ANT(enna) "B" will be the preferred method of connection (see illustration to the right). This type of connection (optional signal splitter required) will work properly for the TV's main on-screen features, as well as retain all the features designed for PIP. For more details on PIP, refer to pages 49-52 in the Directions for Use manual that came with your set.

1

Connect a cable TV signal to a 75-ohm two-way signal splitter (an optional accessory).

Or
Connect an outdoor or indoor antenna signal to the 75-ohm two-way signal splitter. If your antenna has flat twin-lead wire (300 ohm), you must first attach the antenna wires to the screws on a 300-to-75-ohm adapter before connecting to the two-way signal splitter.

2

Connect two lengths of RF coaxial cable to the two output plugs on the two-way signal splitter. The two lengths of RF coaxial cable must have F-type connectors (screw-on or push type) on their ends.

3

Connect one of the RF coaxial cables coming from two-way signal splitter to the PIP ANT(enna) "B" input on the back of the TV and the other RF coaxial cable to the ANT(enna) "A" input on the back of the TV.

NOTE: Proper operation of your TV is not dependent upon the connection of the PIP ANT(enna) "B" input. The main purpose of the input is to provide an easily connected, dedicated picture source for the PIP feature. You can, however, use the PIP ANT(enna) "B" input to connect and display other signal sources such as an outdoor or indoor antenna or a video game player.

Although the PIP ANT(enna) "B" input can be used and swapped as the source for the TV's main picture, certain setup features (such as Auto-Chroma) are based only on your TV's detecting a signal at the ANT(enna) "A" input. To ensure that all features are operating properly, you may not want to rely solely on the PIP ANT(enna) "B" input as your TV's main screen signal source.

SMART HELP

You can treat the output connection of a satellite receiver as you would a standard antenna or cable TV signal, except the satellite signal should not be split as shown in the illustration to the right. The satellite signal should go directly into the ANT(enna) "A" input connection on the back of the TV. Then, if you would like, use the PIP ANT(enna) "B" input connection for either an outdoor/indoor antenna or cable TV signal. Refer to the owner's manual for the satellite box to get further information on connections.

Run Auto Program to store in the TV's memory only the channels with active broadcast stations. See page 5 for details.

SMART HELP

Contact your dealer, or our Parts Information Center at 1-800-851-8885 to order the following accessories: two-way signal splitter, RF coaxial cable, 300-ohm to 75-ohm adapter, combination VHF/UHF antenna.
