

DIGITAL EYES AND EARS

Video surveillance has traditionally been a straight-forward analogue affair run by the physical security staff. But with the rise of IP-based digital systems, video surveillance has become another application on the corporate network managed by the IT department.

Mission-critical digital surveillance cameras are IP-based and capture better detail than analogue cameras, with video footage typically stored in corporate servers and shared over IP networks. One of the reasons for the growing popularity of IP-based network cameras is that its much more flexible. Analogue cameras require dedicated fibre strands for each group of eight cameras. The cameras are streaming all the time and tying up bandwidth, typically 4.5 to 6Mbps per second per camera. With IP-based digital video, you can use on-demand and multicasting, which definitely is less bandwidth. Maintaining it is easier because people in IT organisations are experienced in network management. From a CIO's perspective, managing the existing network to act as a security system is certainly cost-effective, from both the hardware and staffing perspective. But it's also a way to beef up security. IP video-surveillance systems offer features far more advanced than what you can get from standard analogue CCTV (closed circuit) TV. It's no wonder these systems are becoming increasingly popular in the enterprise.

But it's the new applications that are propelling a surveillance surge. If you can look at customers, why not for marketing count them? If you're watching cash tills, why not let HR train new staffers with that video? If you can see all those shipping containers, why not pass those pictures to logistics? Software tools that do all this have launched video surveillance, integrating cameras into the enterprise and society at large.

Though analogue still accounts for more than 60% of the installed CCTV market, industry analysts expect sales of newer surveillance technologies, such as networked video and emerging IP-based video, to rise at faster rates. There is a caveat for IT managers looking at this new mode of surveillance: the faster a new technology is deployed, the less intelligent that deployment seems to be. So watch out for places where decision-makers are camera-happy but not necessarily camera-smart. Amidst the rush to get the latest, most powerful surveillance tools, you might need to apply some knowledge, structure and direction, else you run the risk of building up inefficient, ineffective surveillance systems.
