Results of regression-based and other approaches to modeling observed patterns in the presence of missing data are compared. Although the regression-based approach is commonly used, it is not always appropriate, as certain aspects of the missingness may be important. Regression-based methods are compared against other methods, including using observed values (listwise deletion), using the maximum likelihood (EM) algorithm, using the maximum likelihood (FIML) procedure, and using a multiple imputation (MI) procedure. The MI procedure is compared against the other methods, and the results are discussed. The MI procedure is shown to be the most appropriate method for handling missing data in this context.
