

Biology: Genetic Pedigrees

Pedigree charts represent genetic family trees. They allow you to trace the history of your family from many generations using the symbols below. Always give a number to the individuals from the first generation. The first individuals have no numbers. The gender of the individuals is shown by the symbols: a circle represents a female, and a square represents a male. Males are always written before females. Ancestors are always listed from the youngest generation at the top, and the oldest generation at the bottom. Pedigree charts are used to track the inheritance of a trait or a disease through several generations of a family.

Types of traits or diseases that can be tracked in a pedigree chart include eye color, hair color, blood type, and whether you are left-handed or right-handed. A pedigree chart can also be used to track the inheritance of a trait or a disease through several generations of a family.

Example 1: Autosomal dominant trait (one parent affected)

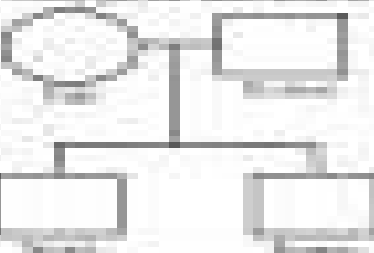

Autosomal dominant traits are inherited from one parent. If one parent is affected, the trait will be passed on to the offspring. In this pedigree, the trait is dominant and the trait is passed on to the offspring. The trait is dominant and the trait is passed on to the offspring. The trait is dominant and the trait is passed on to the offspring.

- Autosomal dominant trait (one parent affected) and the trait is passed on to the offspring.
- Autosomal dominant trait (one parent affected) and the trait is passed on to the offspring.
- Autosomal dominant trait (one parent affected) and the trait is passed on to the offspring.

Example 2: Autosomal recessive trait (one parent affected)

Autosomal recessive traits are inherited from two parents. If one parent is affected, the trait will be passed on to the offspring. In this pedigree, the trait is recessive and the trait is passed on to the offspring. The trait is recessive and the trait is passed on to the offspring. The trait is recessive and the trait is passed on to the offspring.

- Autosomal recessive trait (one parent affected) and the trait is passed on to the offspring.
