Results of regression-based and other approaches to modeling observed patterns in the presence of missing data are compared. Although the regression-based approach is commonly used, it is not always appropriate, as certain aspects of the missingness may be important. Regression-based methods are compared to other approaches, including using observed patterns (e.g., MCAR, MAR, MNAR) to guide the selection of the appropriate regression model. The results suggest that the regression-based approach is not always the best choice, and that other approaches may be more appropriate in certain situations. The results also suggest that the regression-based approach may be more appropriate in certain situations, and that other approaches may be more appropriate in certain situations.
