- Abstract. Chlamydia is a bacterial pathogen with a worldwide prevalence of 10–20% amongst adolescents. However, little is known about Chlamydia infection rates and associated risk factors amongst adolescents in the United Kingdom. This study aimed to determine the prevalence of Chlamydia amongst adolescents in the United Kingdom and to identify risk factors for Chlamydia infection. A cross-sectional study was conducted in 2005 in a large, multi-ethnic, inner-city area in London. A total of 1,000 adolescents aged 15–19 years were recruited to the study. The prevalence of Chlamydia infection was 10.5% (95% CI 8.5–12.5%). The risk factors for Chlamydia infection were being male, being in a sexual relationship, having multiple sexual partners, and having a sexual partner who was not using a condom. The results of this study suggest that Chlamydia infection is a significant public health problem in the United Kingdom and that there is a need for improved sexual health education and screening programmes for adolescents.

Abstract: The authors present a new method for the analysis of the relationship between the variables of the system and the variables of the environment. The method is based on the analysis of the system's behavior in the presence of external disturbances. The authors show that the method can be used to identify the system's parameters and to design a control system that is robust to external disturbances. The authors also show that the method can be used to design a control system that is robust to parameter variations. The authors conclude that the method is a powerful tool for the analysis and design of control systems.

These studies suggest, however, that a positive attitude towards the environment is not sufficient to ensure that people will engage in pro-environmental actions. Several studies have shown that people with positive attitudes towards the environment do not always engage in pro-environmental actions. For example, a study by Geller and Friedman (1985) found that people with positive attitudes towards the environment did not always engage in pro-environmental actions. This suggests that other factors, such as social norms and perceived barriers, may also influence pro-environmental behavior.
