An organism's phenotype is the observable characteristics of an organism. It is the result of the interaction of the organism's genotype (the genetic code) and the environment. The genotype is the genetic code that determines the organism's phenotype.

Development

Development is the process by which an organism grows and changes from a single-celled zygote into a multicellular organism. It involves the differentiation of cells into specialized tissues and organs. The process of development is controlled by a complex set of genes and environmental factors.

Environmental influences

Environmental influences can affect an organism's phenotype. For example, a plant that grows in a sunny, well-watered environment will have a different phenotype than a plant that grows in a shady, dry environment. Environmental influences can also affect an organism's development.

Genetic influences

Genetic influences can affect an organism's phenotype. For example, a plant with a genetic mutation that affects its ability to produce chlorophyll will have a different phenotype than a plant with a normal genetic code.

Heritability

Heritability is the proportion of an organism's phenotype that is determined by its genotype. It is a measure of the extent to which an organism's phenotype is inherited from its parents. Heritability can be estimated by comparing the phenotypes of related and unrelated individuals.

Genetic engineering

Genetic engineering is the process of manipulating an organism's genetic code. It involves the use of recombinant DNA technology to insert or delete specific genes. Genetic engineering can be used to create new organisms with desired traits, such as resistance to disease or the ability to produce a specific protein.

Genetic engineering applications

Genetic engineering has many applications, including the production of insulin, the development of new drugs, and the creation of transgenic crops.
