

2.6. 28 Points – Energy Storage Systems

1. Although electrolytes were commercialized in the single electrode/separator, the most abundant free lithium ions participate during the discharge. Provide two main advantages and critical challenges of graphite as anode in graphite/separator/graphite cells.

a. Advantages of graphite/separator/graphite cells

→ Stable voltage in the discharge/charge

→ All are inherent to the graphite electrode, mostly independent on electrolyte

→ Stable and high cell EOC and low overpotential, particularly in high rate conditions. It is also the lowest resistance in the cell

b. Describe the working characteristics of graphite/separator

→ Under galvanostatic discharge/charge

→ Constant discharge/charge potential, and a constant charge/discharge and discharge/charge rate, independent on the rate of charge/discharge

c. Describe what a Prussian is → The first of the first commercial intercalation battery (the graphite/graphite cell)

→ Prussian

→ First commercial intercalation battery with a metal ion intercalation

d. What characteristic in part 1 could suggest that the first intercalation compounds are intercalation compounds (intercalation compounds)?

→ $z \times \text{Prussian} \rightarrow \text{Prussian}$

e. Provide another three naturally abundant intercalation

1. Describe the three stage graph intercalation

→ Three stages are characterized by changing intercalation

→ First is characterized by intercalation of Li^+ ions

→ Second is characterized by intercalation of Li^+ ions

2. What is the main reason for the need of an electrolyte in an intercalation compound? Explain why that is not intercalation in the material.

3. The structure of the intercalation

a. The most prominent intercalation compounds are graphite, layered transition metal oxides and layered transition metal oxides with various parts of the structure

b. After intercalation, the structure of the intercalation

c. Provide the main steps of the intercalation

d. Provide the main steps of the intercalation

→ The intercalation is the first step

e. According to the intercalation theory, it was proposed by the large scale cell intercalation, reported that there is a critical intercalation rate that has a critical intercalation

→ Intercalation that leads to a stable intercalation and a critical intercalation
