Market Entry Strategy

Market entry strategy is the initial decision regarding the geographical area where the firm will first introduce its product. This strategy involves the company's marketing mix and its distribution channels.

Exporting and importing are the most common methods of international trade. Exporting involves selling goods or services to a foreign market, while importing involves buying goods or services from a foreign market.

Types of Market Entry

The four types of market entry are: Export, License, Joint Venture, and Wholly Owned Subsidiary. Each type has its own advantages and disadvantages. Exporting is the simplest and least costly method, while a wholly owned subsidiary is the most complex and costly.

Advantages and Disadvantages of Market Entry

Exporting and importing have several advantages and disadvantages. Exporting is the simplest and least costly method, while importing is the most complex and costly. Licensing and joint ventures are intermediate methods that offer a balance of risk and reward.

The choice of market entry strategy depends on a number of factors, including the company's resources, the target market, and the competitive environment.
