

5 Major Perspectives in Psychology

Psychology is the scientific study of how we think, feel, and behave. In this module, you'll get an introduction to the four major perspectives that have shaped modern psychological research.

Why do you act the way you do? These questions interested early psychologists and they did their early experiments hoping to find out more about it. On today's view, the answer remains elusive but we believe that the scientific study of psychology must not have to involve science that there is the science of living. But the scientific study of psychology only starts back to a little more a scientific perspective.

Some famous people regard the four psychology perspectives (27%), psychologists have created various separate scientific theories about the personality, some have created various cultural influences. The psychology perspective changed to include the scientific study of the human mind. The four different aspects, including biological, psychological, environmental, and social psychological perspectives. Each has its own set of ideas that they represent that guide modern psychological research.

Biological Perspective: Key points

Biological psychologists look at how your nervous system, hormones, and genetics influence your behavior. Biological psychologists might find important differences in your mental health and your brain. Some of the differences in your brain are genetic, some are environmental and some are both.

So what does that mean? It means that for the biological perspective, you are the sum of your parts. Your brain and your nervous system are the key to your behavior. Some of the differences in your brain are genetic. All of your behavior and mental and physical health. The biological perspective believes that the brain and the nervous system are the key to your behavior and that the brain and the nervous system are the key to your behavior. The biological perspective believes that the brain and the nervous system are the key to your behavior.

Psychodynamic Perspective: Key points

The psychodynamic perspective was developed by Sigmund Freud who believed that many of our behaviors are driven by our mind. Psychodynamic people believe that our behaviors are driven by our mind. Some of the differences in your brain are genetic, some are environmental and some are both. The psychodynamic perspective believes that the brain and the nervous system are the key to your behavior.

There are a lot of ideas about the mind and the brain. Some of the ideas are that the brain and the nervous system are the key to your behavior.
