

You know, when you're young...when you're so young that you think everything is just...it's just as real as it gets...

When you're that young, it's hard to make sense of right or wrong.

I was like that when I was seventeen. I was just young and foolish. I thought that the world would just work the way that I wanted it to. I figured that I wouldn't really have to try and things would just come together. It wasn't that way, though.

Andrea was a dancer. She was just vibrant and full of life. She was so beautiful and amazing, you know? She was that girl. The one the other guys always fawned over and checked out. Any guy that was with her...the other guys were jealous.

I was that guy. I was her guy, and she was my girl.

[Pause]

We were so in love—or at least we thought we were. Every time I saw her it was like being in the presence of an angel. I was smitten. She was amazing.

We met at a musical theater camp. I know, I know. I was in it for the girls, and, well, there she was.

She could really sing. And she could dance like nothing you've seen before. Everything about her was just it, you know?

We didn't get together for a few months. It took her a while to fall for my charms. She did, though.

[Pause]

We had been together for almost six months when the accident happened. I remember the call.

It was a weeknight. I think it was Tuesday, or Wednesday. Not like it mattered.

I was on the couch watching TV, and my cell rang. I didn't recognize the number, but I answered. All I heard was sobbing, then her voice. It was soft, sad, distraught.

She told me that he had been in an accident. A traffic accident. He was hit head-on. The police had called her mom to tell her...he was gone.
