  - A clean classroom
  - Planning
  - A good seating arrangement
- Suppose the students in your computer science class vary greatly in the amount of experience and knowledge they have about computers. What can you do as a teacher to make student evaluations fair to everyone?
  - Evaluate how much each student learns in addition to whether or not the student gets the correct answers on tests
  - Grade class tests on a curve
  - Put more weight on class research projects than on tests
  - Grade students only according to test results
- Which type of classroom environment is more likely to help more students to learn?
  - One that focuses on order.
  - One that is pleasant and comfortable.

  - Email your notes and diagrams to all the students in advance so that they can print them out at home and bring them to class
  - Prepare your notes on transparencies and display them using an overhead projector
- How can you best ensure that your students quickly settle down at the beginning of class so that you can get on with your lesson?

  - Use the time while the students are settling in to catch up on paper work
  - Threaten to send the whole class to detention
  - Tell the students that they can leave early if the class gets started on time
- Getting the classroom ready for the first day of school can be overwhelming for a new teacher. As the big day comes, one often must make some hard choices and leave a few things to be done later. Which of the following could wait a few more days if necessary?
  - Optimize arrangement of student desks

  - Verify that equipment such as overhead projectors and computer workstations are functional and ready to use
- When students disagree during a class discussion, what should the teacher do to resolve the disagreement so that the class can proceed in an organized fashion?

  - Encourage the students to work out their differences through a logical and friendly debate
  - Tell the students that whenever there is a disagreement in class, the student who is right will get extra credit
  - Discourage the students from disagreeing with each other in class, and instead have them ask you when they have a question
