

Enhancing Spatial Orientation for People Living with Dementia in the Urban Environment: An Evaluation-Study of the Wayfinding Infrastructure

Janissa Altona, Emily Mena, Henrik Wiegelmann, Julia Misonow, Benjamin Schütz & Karin Wolf-Ostermann

Thematic Background and Research Question

- People living with dementia (PwD): at risk of being more apartment/housebound if built-neighbourhood environment (NBE) cannot be used with a sense of security ("shrinking world")¹⁻⁵
- Positive influences of the NBE on physical and mental health, self-determination, social participation, and cognitive functioning of PwD⁶⁻¹⁰
- Dementia-friendly NBE aspects: contribute to longer retention of PwD in own homes^{1,11}
- Wayfinding infrastructure: one aspect of a well-designed NBE that prevents PwD from losing orientation or getting lost
- Little evidence on what wayfinding infrastructure facilitate or hinder orientation of PwD in urban areas

How are barriers and resources of the wayfinding infrastructure distributed in Bremen and what are recommendations to achieve a dementia-friendly city?

Method

- Part of mixed-method study
- Development of a questionnaire to evaluate local wayfinding infrastructure in Bremen
- Cross-sectional validation study
- Using Apple Maps Street (2020/22) view with a 360-degree viewing angle
- Approximately 3,000 randomly selected geo coordinates with a high proportion of older residents (>65 years) → Eindorff, Mitte, Oberneuland, Burg-Lesum and Obervieland

Wayfinding infrastructure sectioned in seven different thematic blocks:

- General streetscape
- Complexity of the public traffic area
- Footpaths, bicycle paths, motorways
- Public transport stops
- Practical, aesthetic, and natural design elements
- Buildings
- Signage

Preliminary Results

- Middle/central locations are better equipped with good wayfinding infrastructure
- Central and/or public locations have more orientation points or signage, but the possibility of confusion increases
- Very little public signage for orientation (especially in non-touristic areas)
- A lot of natural design elements and few aesthetic design elements
- Practical design elements mostly in central areas

Summary and Discussion

- The results reveal orientation structures that promote and inhibit PwD and provide a basis for a subsequent automated digital assessment of orientation infrastructures
- The new easy-to-obtain insights can contribute to the development of measures to promote dementia-friendly urban residential structures
- Next steps: conduct focus groups and individual interviews with PwD and their informal carers/family members to weight the questionnaire and support the development of dementia-friendly initiatives in Bremen
