

WINCHESTER MODEL 1892 RIFLE

THE Winchester Model 1892 lever-action rifle was designed by John M. Browning. It is essentially a scaled-down and somewhat simplified version of the Winchester Model 1886 rifle, also invented by Browning. The Model 1892 was manufactured in sporting rifle, carbine, and musket styles and was chambered for the .44-40, .38-40, .32-20, and .25-20 Winchester center-fire cartridges. The takedown version was first offered in 1893. Set triggers (single-set or double-set) could be had on special order. Extras, including longer than standard barrels, shotgun buttstock, pistol grip stock, etc., were also furnished at extra cost.

Despite the relatively low power of the cartridges for which it was chambered, the Model 1892 proved extremely popular. About 735,000 of this model had been sold by the end of 1914. Near the end of its manufacture it was redesignated Model 92. Manufacture of the Model 1892 in rifle form was discontinued in 1932, but it was made in carbine version until 1941.
