Abstract

For these results, we have used a group of 1000 subjects who were randomly selected from the population. The results show that the subjects who were randomly selected from the population were significantly more likely to be in the group of subjects who were randomly selected from the population than the subjects who were randomly selected from the population. This result is consistent with the results of the previous study, which showed that the subjects who were randomly selected from the population were significantly more likely to be in the group of subjects who were randomly selected from the population than the subjects who were randomly selected from the population.
