ESSIE SUMMERS

CHAPTER ONE

ELISSA MONTGOMERY stared blankly at Rupert Airlie. 'Go right to New Zealand to redecorate Airlie House for you? You must be joking! It would be so much cheaper to engage a firm there. The firm Victoria worked for, for instance.'

Rupert Airlie chuckled. 'Put it down to a whim, Elissa. I'm old enough now to be indulged in such things.'

'Don't give me that. I may have called you Uncle Rupert ten years ago, but when you suddenly turned up in England, I was amazed to find you so young. But even a whim has to have some reason behind it, so ... ?'

'Because I don't want a stranger doing it, lass. You knew and loved Airlie House and the Glen and the lake when your mother was governess to my children. I think you were even keener than Judith and Elspeth to listen to the stories of the early days, so you have a feeling for it. You wouldn't banish things that ought to be retained for posterity, or put way-out styles into a one-hundred-year-old dwelling. When you took me through that Georgian house you restored in the next village I made up my mind. I've set my heart on it, girl. When you said you had three months' leave to pay a surprise visit to your mother in Canada, and that Victoria Doig was going to take your place here, I felt it was providential. I got hold of Victoria on the quiet and found out she could do it for an indefinite period if need be.'

'If you'd fly out to Ludwigtown for a few weeks, then I'd pay your fare there and back, with a stop-over on the way back to see Meg. Canada is practically on the way. I take it she wants to stay as long as possible with her sister?'

'Yes. It's helping Aunt Jean to adjust to her sudden loss better, and her daughter will be taking up a position in her home town later. But it will cost you the earth, Rupert.'
