

770 CHAPTER 20 • THE CARDIOVASCULAR SYSTEM: THE HEART

Figure 20.8 The coronary circulation. The views of the heart from the anterior aspect in (a) and (b) are drawn as if the heart were transparent to reveal blood vessels on the posterior aspect.

 The right and left coronary arteries deliver blood to the heart; the coronary veins drain blood from the heart into the coronary sinus.

(a) Anterior view of coronary arteries

(b) Anterior view of coronary veins

Coronary Veins

After blood passes through the arteries of the coronary circulation, it flows into capillaries, where it delivers oxygen and nutrients to the heart muscle and collects carbon dioxide and waste, and then moves into coronary veins. Most of the deoxygenated blood from the myocardium drains into a large vascular sinus in the coronary sulcus on the posterior surface of the heart, called the coronary sinus (Figure 20.8b). (A vascular sinus is a thin-walled vein that has no smooth muscle to alter its diameter.) The deoxygenated blood in the coronary sinus empties into the right atrium. The principal tributaries carrying blood into the coronary sinus are the following:

- Great cardiac vein in the anterior interventricular sulcus, which drains the areas of the heart supplied by the left coronary artery (left and right ventricles and left atrium)
- Middle cardiac vein in the posterior interventricular sulcus, which drains the areas supplied by the posterior interventricular branch of the right coronary artery (left and right ventricles)

- Small cardiac vein in the coronary sulcus, which drains the right atrium and right ventricle
- Anterior cardiac veins, which drain the right ventricle and open directly into the right atrium

When blockage of a coronary artery deprives the heart muscle of oxygen, reperfusion (re'-per-FYU-zhun), the reestablishment of blood flow, may damage the tissue further. This surprising effect is due to the formation of oxygen free radicals from the re-introduced oxygen. As you learned in Chapter 2, free radicals are molecules that have an unpaired electron (see Figure 2.3b). These unstable, highly reactive molecules cause chain reactions that lead to cellular damage and death. To counter the effects of oxygen free radicals, body cells produce enzymes that convert free radicals to less reactive substances. Two such enzymes are superoxide dismutase (dis-MÜ-täs) and catalase (KAT-a-läs). In addition, nutrients such as vitamin E, vitamin C, beta-carotene, zinc, and selenium serve as antioxidants, which remove oxygen free radicals from circulation. Drugs that lessen reperfusion damage after a heart attack or stroke are currently under development.
