Skeletal Muscle Physiology

OBJECTIVES

1. To define motor unit, twitch, latent period, contraction phase, relaxation phase, threshold, summation, tetanus, fatigue, isometric contraction, and isotonic contraction
2. To understand how nerve impulses trigger muscle movement
3. To describe the phases of a muscle twitch
4. To identify threshold and maximal stimuli
5. To understand the effect of increases in stimulus intensity on a muscle
6. To understand the effect of increases in stimulus frequency on a muscle
7. To demonstrate muscle fatigue
8. To explain the differences between isometric and isotonic muscle contractions

Humans make voluntary decisions to talk, walk, stand up, or sit down. The muscles that make these actions possible are skeletal muscles. Skeletal muscle is generally muscle that is attached to the skeleton of the body, although there are some exceptions—for example, the obicularis oris, a muscle around the mouth, never attaches to any skeletal element. Skeletal muscles characteristically span two joints and attach to the skeleton via tendons connecting to the periosteum of the bone.

The Motor Unit and Muscle Contraction

A motor unit consists of a motor neuron and all of the muscle fibers it innervates. Motor neurons direct muscles when and when not to contract. A motor neuron and a muscle cell intersect at what is called the neuromuscular junction. Specifically, the neuromuscular junction is where the axon terminal of the neuron meets a specialized region of the muscle cell's plasma membrane. This specialized region is called the motor end-plate. An action potential (depolarization) in a motor neuron triggers the release of acetylcholine, which diffuses into the muscle plasma membrane (also known as the sarcolemma). The acetylcholine binds to receptors on the muscle cell, initiating a change in ion permeability that results in depolarization of the muscle plasma membrane, called an end-plate potential. The end-plate potential, in turn, triggers a series of events that results in the contraction of a muscle cell. This entire process is called excitation-contraction coupling.

We will be simulating this process in the following activities, only instead of using acetylcholine to trigger action potentials, we will be using electrical shocks. The shocks will be administered by an electrical stimulator that can be set for the precise voltage, frequency, and duration of shock desired. When
