Verbal Communication

An act of verbal communication occurs when one of the participants uses words to convey a message. Words serve to represent ideas that the speaker wants to communicate, and they do not have inherent meaning by themselves (Simon et al., 2018). Humans give meaning to words, and the lack of clarity and subsequent misunderstanding in verbal communication might lead to severe consequences. For example, an inaccurate verbal communication between the NASCAR driver and their spotter on the stands might result in hitting another car and causing a serious accident. Therefore, verbal communication should be clear, concise, and correct to be effective.

Principles of Verbal Communication

When it comes to principles, verbal communication mostly revolves around the meaning of words given to them. For instance, there are two possible word meanings: denotative and connotative (Simon et al., 2018). A denotative meaning meets the dictionary article, while the connotative one can involve an emotional association. Words in denotative meaning can be used in verbal communication relatively safely. For example, using the word "pig" to define an animal would be perfectly acceptable. However, the same word also has a negative connotative meaning towards police
