Primary Care Intervention for Obese and Overweight Adolescents and Children

Lisa Jenner

ABC University

Abstract

The obvious increase in the number of obese and overweight adolescents and children have often been accompanied with a rise in adverse health effects. These include diabetes and cardiovascular disease. With this in mind, there is an obvious need for an evidence-based intervention which may be useful among primary care providers in addressing this concern. Thus, the purpose of this project is to provide education to adolescents and children, including their families, regarding healthy nutrition, as well as the need for physical activity. This will ultimately result to an increase in knowledge about healthy lifestyle patterns while reducing body mass index (BMI) significantly. This project also provides further evidence that remote education, in collaboration with motivational interviewing can also result in advantageous outcomes, and may also provide a cost-effective and convenient approach in reaching this younger population.

Introduction

Obesity among the younger generation, especially adolescents and children appears to be a growing problem related to health in the United States. As a matter of fact, the Centers for Disease Control (CDC, 2014) explains that the rates involving childhood obesity have already tripled during the past three years only. Children who are at risk may deal with a number of negative health impacts, including diabetes and cardiovascular diseases, as well as some social implications and psychological distress.

With this, primary care providers are positioned uniquely to determine the individuals who are at risk for these diseases, assessing and screening them for complication, educating and treating whenever appropriate. The aim of this research project is to provide the needed education to adolescents and children, including their families, regarding healthy nutrition, as well as the need to engage in physical activity, thus improving knowledge in relation to healthy patterns in lifestyle while reducing body mass index.
