

- Sensation involves the initial or elementary processes that occur at the “beginning” of the sensory system.
- Vision- when specific wavelengths of light stimulate rods or cones of the retina.
- Audition- when specific Hz of sound stimulate hair cells of the cochlea.
- Olfaction and gustation- when specific molecules bind to receptors like a key fitting into a lock.

Distal and Proximal Stimuli

- Distal stimulus
 - Environmental stimulus are all objects in the environment that are available to the observer.
 - Observer selectively attends to objects.
 - Humans cannot take in everything at once because it would be overwhelming to the nervous system. We selectively attend to what we want to focus on.
 - Stimulus impinges on receptors resulting in internal representation.
- Steps one and two of the perceptual process:
 - Step one
 - Information about the distal stimulus is carried by light.
 - Step two
 - The light is transformed when it is reflected from the distal stimulus, when it travels through the knowledgosphere, and when it is focused by the eye's optical system. The result is the proximal stimulus, the image of the stimulus on the retina, which is a representation of the stimulus.

- Principle of transformation
 - When the stimuli and the responses created by stimuli are transformed, or changed, between the environmental stimuli and perception.

Receptor Processes (Step Three of the Perceptual Process)
