

expelled after 1945 and the Slovak Socialist Republic was in preparation. In this brief summer the Czechs and Slovaks acknowledged their spiritual debt to Masaryk, recognizing that his vision for the state, though unrealized in his own time, was "not only an integral part of the Czechoslovak national tradition but also a living force in their own time."

In sum, Szporluk has provided a masterly analysis of Masaryk's political thought. By pointing to broader problems throughout, he has provided the foundation and set the agenda for further research on this influential figure in the history of East Central Europe.

THE POLITICS OF ETHNIC SURVIVAL: GERMANS IN PRAGUE, 1861-1914. By Gary B. Cohen. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1981. xvii, 344 pp. + 15 pp. plates. Maps. Tables. $27.50.

This is a study of the struggle of the German community of Prague for survival against the rising tide of Czech nationalism, from the restoration of constitutional government in the Habsburg empire in 1861 to the outbreak of World War I. The story is paradoxical, for the Czechs were supposed to be a "subject" people and the Germans a "ruling" nation in the empire. Yet the Germans of Prague were put on the defensive and lost the battle for dominance in the city well before the empire's collapse in 1918.

The Czechs produced a sophisticated literature in their own language in the age of the Renaissance and the Reformation, but during the Counter-Reformation Czech literary language fell into desuetude and Czech became a spoken folk idiom, a language of the "kitchen and nursery." A casual foreign visitor to Prague at the beginning of the nineteenth century would have believed he was in a German city; the language of its administration, commerce, and culture was German. The winds of the Enlightenment had stirred a Czech cultural revival at the end of the eighteenth century, but that movement remained apolitical until 1848. The Czechs and Germans of Bohemia continued to be linked in a common provincial patriotism, which was well expressed in the famous words of Bohemia's provincial governor, Count Leo Thun: "I am neither a Czech nor a German, but a Bohemian."

The revolutions of 1848 politicized both ethnic communities. Their Bohemian Landespatriotismus gave way to ethnic nationalisms that were antagonistic and mutually exclusive. After 1848, the Czech cultural, political, and economic revival moved apace. Whereas before 1848 only workingmen, servants, or visiting country folk spoke Czech, by the end of the century the city's population contained a large, well-educated Czech-speaking middle class. In 1892 the Prague city council, dominated by Czech nationalists, voted to replace the city's bilingual street signs with exclusively Czech ones. Perhaps because it lacked a working-class base, Prague's German community suffered demographic attrition — from 15.3 percent of the city's population (including the suburbs) in 1880 to 7 percent in 1910 and only 4.6 percent in 1921. The ethos of the Prague Germans was upper class. Unlike the Germans in the Bohemian borderlands (the "Sudeten Germans" of the post-World War I period) who provided a fertile ground for German nationalist and nativist (völkisch) radicalism, Prague's Germans generally retained their old German liberal-nationalist outlook. They defended themselves vigorously against the Czechs but used only legal, political, cultural, and economic means and avoided violence.

The Austrian authorities were reluctant to provide statistical ammunition that might contribute to ethnic rivalries. Statistical evidence for the study of Czech-German relations in Prague is not abundant. Nevertheless, by using an interdisciplinary approach and

The Politics Of Ethnic Survival Germans In Prague 1861-1914:

The Politics of Ethnic Survival Gary B. Cohen, 2006 This book examines how one of Imperial Austria's principal ethnic conflicts that between Czechs and Germans developed in one of the major cities during the era of industrialization and urban growth. It shows how the inhabitants of Prague, the capital of Bohemia, constructed and articulated ethnic group loyalties and social solidarities over the course of the nineteenth century. The German-speaking inhabitants of the Bohemian capital developed a group identification and defined themselves as a minority as they dealt with growing Czech political and economic strength in the city and with their own sharp numerical decline. In the 1910 census, only seven percent of the metropolitan population claimed that they spoke primarily German. The study uses census returns, extensive police and bureaucratic records, newspaper accounts, and memoirs on local social and political life to show how the German minority and the Czech majority developed demographically and economically in relation to each other and created separate social and political lives for their group members. The study carefully traces the roles of occupation, class, religion, and political ideology in the formation of German group loyalties and social solidarities. The social relations which bound together the members of the German-speaking minority and the social boundaries which separated them from the Czech majority at the end of the nineteenth century proved to be selective, and considerable contact went on across the lines in many facets of individuals' everyday life. As the German minority developed a shared group life, what came to define them and to separate them from the Czech majority was a shared Austro-German ethnic and national loyalty, an Austro-German national liberal ideology, the defense of common middle-class and lower middle-class social and political interests, and a shared German public life. Both German-speaking Catholics and Jews could share in the sense of German community and group solidarity provided they upheld middle-class liberal values. The bonds of community for the middle-class and lower middle-class Germans in Prague established in the 1860s tended to exclude German-speaking wage laborers and lower middle-class radical nationalists who might challenge liberal national values. Despite all the efforts to strengthen German community solidarity and combat assimilation of German speakers with the Czech majority, from the 1880s to after 1900, the organized German community could do little to prevent the absorption of working-class German speakers into the Czech population of the industrial districts.
