

PULMONARY REHABILITATION

Definition: a multidimensional program that utilizes exercise, group education, smoking cessation, and nutritional guidance to improve symptoms and function in those with respiratory diseases. Pulmonary rehabilitation improves exercise performance, quality of life, and feelings of dyspnea, and reduces the number of hospitalizations. It is recommended for those with stable COPD and for those who are recovering from an exacerbation.

- According to Sullivan (20?), pulmonary rehabilitation is a multidisciplinary comprehensive program of care for patients with chronic respiratory disease that is designed to reduce symptoms, optimize physical functioning and social participation, and reduce health care costs. A diversity of health professionals is essential to meet the medical, physical, social, and psychological needs of the patient with pulmonary disease. The team may include a:

- Nurse
- Physician
- Physical therapist
- Occupational therapist
- Nutritionist
- Pharmacist
- Respiratory care practitioner
- Exercise physiologist
- Psychologist, and
- the patient and the patient's family and caregivers (which is the most important)

Postural Drainage

Definition: One of the techniques for clearing secretions which uses gravity to assist in drainage of accumulated secretion from specific lung areas. Positioning a patient so that the bronchus of the involved lung segment is perpendicular to the ground is the basis for postural drainage. Using gravity, these positions assist the mucociliary transport system in removing excessive secretions from the tracheobronchial tree.

Positions for Postural Drainage

- Bed or drainage table flat.
- Patient leans back on pillow at 30° angle against therapist.
