

monopolistic competition. They can perform nearly the same functions but has specific attributes or qualities recognizable by potential buyers. These goods are not close substitutes but their cross price elasticity is positive in description.

Pure competition vs. oligopoly

Number of participants firms

In an oligopoly market segment, the number of firms is few simply because of the existence of some barriers to entry (Depken, 2005). The firms depend on each other and this forms a reason for the inclusion of market barriers. Their aim is to perpetually control the market segment. This contrasts with a purely competitive market where the number of buyers and sellers in the market is large. There are no barriers to entry into a competitive market structure.

Types of products

The products in an oligopoly market are uniform or differentiated. Examples of such products include the petroleum industry (BP and other firms) and the industry dealing with soft drinks (coca cola). With a purely competitive structure the products are in standard form (Depken, 2005). An example given is the agricultural sector selling a combination of potatoes and wheat.

Control over prices

Oligopoly market structure participates in setting their prices divergent from a purely competitive structure where the firms take the prices from the industry. Oligopoly market structure produce where their marginal costs is equated to marginal revenue consequently maximizing profits.

Conditions of enter the industry

There are high level of barriers to entry and exit in an oligopoly market structure. Some of the available instruments used by the industry to prevent entry are: patent rights, economies of scale, and other deliberate actions done by firms to discourage prospective firms. On the other hand, a purely competitive market has free entry and exit phenomenon.
