XII 3. Amino acids are found throughout the cytoplasm. They are carried to the ribosomes by special RNA molecules called transfer (or "taxi") RNA, or tRNA. Each tRNA has 3 nucleotides and a unique shape that fits with a specific amino acid. Since there are 20 different amino acids there must be at least 20 different tRNA's, one for each amino acid. The 3 bases of the tRNA temporarily attach to complementary three base sequences on the mRNA at the ribosome. Enzymes bond the amino acids carried by the tRNAs together and a chain of amino acids begins to form. When all specified amino acids have been added a complete protein or polypeptide has been built (Fig. 6).

XIII 4. The synthesis of a peptide chain thus occurs as the ribosome moves along the mRNA reading its code and matching up with tRNA's carrying amino acids in the sequence specified. (Fig. 16)

XIV 5. tRNAs, after delivering their amino acids, are free to go once again and pick up another of their specific amino acids from the cytoplasm. (Fig. 6)

XV The complexity of the process of protein synthesis may surprise you. This complexity is believed to be nature's insurance against errors in carrying out the genetic instructions in the DNA. Even the misplacement of a single amino acid out of several hundreds or thousands in a protein can change its shape and thereby alter its function. Depending on the role of that protein in the organism this can have devastating, even lethal, consequences.

Fig. 16

3. Each triplet on the messenger RNA temporarily bonds with a transfer RNA with its specific amino acid attached.

4. The ribosome moves along the messenger RNA as it reads the code. Amino acids are joined in the order coded, forming a polypeptide.

5. After delivering its amino acid, transfer RNA can pick up another molecule of the same amino acid.
