Building of light-colored stone, possibly a church or government building, featuring a large dome and arched windows.

During the Middle Ages, people had little knowledge of what life was like prior to the fall of the Roman Empire. This is largely due to the chaos and disarray that came with the power vacuum created by the collapse of any central power in Western Europe.

This would largely change beginning in the 1300s as scholars would slowly begin to "rediscover" Greek and Roman art, literature and architecture. This resurgence in Greek and Roman achievements is largely due to trade with the Ottoman Empire in the East. Since the Ottomans now controlled the former Roman capital city of Constantinople, they had access to a variety of Roman and Greek artifacts.

Renaissance scholars took advantage of studying these incredibly well-preserved resources. Writers learned Greek and Latin and studied Greek and Roman philosophy and plays. Painters and sculptors recreated sculptures left behind by Greek and Roman artists. Even Architects used Greek columns and Roman arches as inspiration for government buildings created during the Renaissance.

The Birth of Venus depicts the Roman myth of the birth of the goddess Venus.
