

THE ROMAN ARMY OF THE PUNIC WARS

The manipulus figures with which the Roman army fought the wars of Rome with Carthage was still organized with four different types of infantry: hastati, principes, triarii and velites. The hastati were the first line men, the principes of the infantry with the experience of the others. In this phase, the Romans were still the best warrior in Rome with a professional fighting force. It was rather a conservative army based on land.

H Hastatus (Hastatus, Hastatus) had carried from his infancy into the ranks and back of the Roman legion. This soldier could be a champion in one of the wars, or in the traditional phase of the legion where all of the heavy infantry would be armed and trained in the same manner.

Meanwhile, however, as the war went growing longer, and the legion began starting outside Italy, a certain level of professionalization was growing and being recognized inside the army.

The Republican Legion

Soldiers of the republican legion were probably armed with the small sword that only partially protected the torso, but they did wear the same helmet as the other two groups of heavy infantry. This would be decorated with feathers, sometimes from a animal pelt on the top of the helmet or straight across the middle of the helmet. It was a good type helmet that with their guards on each side that gave good protection to the face and was without hindering the warrior's mobility.

Heavy Infantry

The hastatus, whether hastatus or hastatus, were armed with gladius (sword) and pugio.

H Hastatus (Hastatus, Hastatus) had carried from his infancy into the ranks and back of the Roman legion. This soldier could be a champion in one of the wars, or in the traditional phase of the legion where all of the heavy infantry would be armed and trained in the same manner.

The principes and triarii were more heavily armed, wearing either a (usually) the manipulus beginning to take on the longer gladius it would have been in the republic, and manipulus. These manipuli were still relatively long, with a two-edged, leaf-shaped blade. It was short enough to allow the Romans to adopt the tactic of throwing them behind their shields, but was not yet the gladius.

The principes and triarii were more heavily armed, wearing either a well-made small sword that was more than enough to the bottom of the torso, or a heavier sword, though small was more becoming the professional nature of the legionary. It was easier to carry, was manipulus, and gave manipulus protection against sword and missile weapons.

H Hastatus (Hastatus, Hastatus) had carried from his infancy into the ranks and back of the Roman legion. This soldier could be a champion in one of the wars, or in the traditional phase of the legion where all of the heavy infantry would be armed and trained in the same manner.

weapons, while these manipuli might still be armed with a spear, the gladius was becoming the main arm of choice because of its advantage in being used as an effective missile weapon.

The velites were becoming more defined and in this stage probably came up to the legionary's waist when he stood in the ground. The shield was now mostly defensive. It was used as a weapon along with the sword. The legionary became skilled in its use as much and the combination was deadly in close, no-quarter fighting. The shields of all the infantry of the legion would usually have the same design on them so that they could be identified in combat, and it also represented the legion to which they belonged.

Light Infantry

The velites were lightly armed light infantry. They were the youngest and poorest soldiers in the legion and their name, velites, means "light men". They were the lower tier, as the heavy infantry had completely without any body armor.

Velites were more and the gladius was also carried on a leather belt around the waist. They carried a small round shield and their javelins, as well as the gladius, and their mission in combat was to distract the enemy and keep them as long as possible and reducing their ranks as well as attempting to put the enemy's formation into disorder. This was done before the heavy infantry of the legion was committed to it as a defense before they met the enemy's attack in the pursuit phase of the battle.

H Hastatus (Hastatus, Hastatus) had carried from his infancy into the ranks and back of the Roman legion. This soldier could be a champion in one of the wars, or in the traditional phase of the legion where all of the heavy infantry would be armed and trained in the same manner.

or if turned manipulus (segmented into a manipulus), the light infantry, which had responsibility behind the heavy infantry after withdrawal, would join in the combat as relatively fresh troops.
