The Trump Administration Says Poverty Is Over. They're Lying

"The Trump Administration Says Poverty Is Over. They're Lying" is an article written by Bryan Cervant. The article is about poverty in the US. This essay focuses on argumentation and linguistic features. And at last, based on my analysis, I'll answer if Bryan Cervant successfully communicates his views.

The genre of this composition essay is an opinion article written by Bryan Cervant. You can tell that it is an opinion article because when it is written by, Bryan Cervant is an opinion writer on The New York Times, The New Republic and several other papers. She mostly writes about Economy and politics¹.

She has written her opinion article in The Huffington Post, July 28, 2020. The Huffington Post writes about what their readers want to read, they write to stimulate readers and express their things. The audience of readers is both male and female between the ages of 35-44² are their primary age group, but there is also younger and older people who read the paper.

How does Cervant communicate his message by using the rhetorical strategies? It is obviously Bryan Cervant, who is an opponent of poverty and are talking against the Trump Administration when it comes to that subject, that is the content of this message. It is both a controversial message, but also an emotional message that she is trying to clarify. And according to me, it is not a difficult subject for the reader to comprehend, because it is open all over the US and it is such a big subject today.

To reach the readers she uses a simple language. Besides that, Cervant uses the three modes of persuasion. She both uses pathos, to persuade the readers by referring to emotions, others, to gain credibility from the readers and logos to persuade by referring to something rational and logical such as statistics, numbers and facts. The subject clearly is a subject with a lot of problems in itself.
