Plot Summary

The story begins with Saboor and his two children, Abdullah and Pari, taking a journey to Kabul. Although the children are uneasy of the unknown foreign trip, they willingly follow their father and their Uncle Nabi to the Wahidati household. Abdullah recognizes Mrs. Wahidati, who had visited their home earlier. The Wahidatis work for them, because they are poor, and because Saboor lost a son due to the cold of last winter, he is convinced by Nabi convince him that selling Pari to the Wahidati family (who cannot have children of their own) offers the best idea for all of them involved. Saboor's family will get financial help, will have one less mouth to feed, and the Wahidatis will have a child. However, Abdullah and Pari are incredibly close, and their separation is painful and life changing.

Nabi and Suleiman Wahidati have a loveless marriage. Suleiman is secretly in love with Nabi, his servant and Pari's and Abdullah's uncle, and Nabi is a troubled soul. Despite acquiring Pari into her life, even Suleiman suffers a stroke. Nabi feels unhappy and unfulfilled enough to leave him and move to Paris, taking Pari with her. Although we do not learn much about Pari's upbringing, we can sense that Nabi withheld a lot of information from Pari and so, Pari feels a large void in her life. She does not know about her real family (her mother, who died during her birth, her father Saboor, and her brother Abdullah) and the nature of her disconnection with her feels disconnected from her grudging mother, Nabi. Pari eventually marries, has three children, and is widowed in her late forties. A phone call from a Mr. Markos in Afghanistan reveals a lot of her past, as he reads her a letter left behind by Nabi, her estranged uncle.
