

substantial number have no homes and go to bed hungry. The impression he makes by his quest to solve this poverty problem is that every person has the caring heart like him and will work towards ending poverty. The resources available to the rich nations can help developing countries come up with the key to end poverty. However, are they willing to help?

Martin appeals to the audience using his trustworthy character, emotions, and logical reasoning. He persuades the audience by appealing to their emotions. One of the grave problems Martin wants solved for people to live in the world house is lack. To describe the extent of poverty, Martin uses statistics of the people who go hungry to bed every day. Apparently, two thirds of the world goes to bed hungry every day. Many sleep on the street pavements because they do not have a place to call home (Nadell, Langan and Comodromos 596-599). Martin called them impoverished children of God whose health is at stake (Shiman web). In this writing, Martin uses logos to persuade by reasoning. Different parts of the world have the same appeal to achieve parity with their fellow brothers from different races, or ethnicity. To Martin, their argument is valid because people cannot remain forever oppressed. Nevertheless, one thing is of utmost concern to him. What does it benefit anyone to have freedom and justice and live in a world stricken by poverty and doomed to extinction by war? This is pure logic.

From this piece of writing, we understand the nature of Martin as a person concerned of other people's affairs. He is appealing us by his sympathetic personality that will not wait and watch a fellow brother sleep hungry or go through the pains of destructive war (Nadell, Langan and Comodromos 596-599). In conclusion, "World House" implies a peaceful world where every citizen and others has the same rights, live in peace, and have a place to call home. He argues that with the current technology, no individual citizen is supposed to want in anything decent, especially food, clothing, medical, and shelter.
