Therapist Effects On Attrition In Psychotherapy Outpatients Bestmasters:

Therapist Effects on Attrition in Psychotherapy Outpatients Dirk Zimmermann, 2014-12-23 Dirk Zimmermann illustrates that some therapists significantly differ concerning their average dropout rates. He points out that initial impairment is a strong predictor of early termination. Different dropout criteria as well as various explaining variables on patient and on therapist level were assessed. Premature treatment termination is a common phenomenon in psychotherapy with mean dropout rates of about 20%. Therapist effects account for 3% 4% of the variation in dropout. Attrition and Psychotherapy, 2019 Attrition in psychotherapy also known as dropout is a problem that affects clients who terminate their families therapists mental health systems and the overall community. Research on attrition is vast. However the majority of this research has been done post hoc relied on quantitative methods and looked primarily at client demographic variables as the predictors of attrition. This has resulted in inconsistent findings offers little to no useful information about attrition and appears to blame clients for failed therapy. There has been little research on attrition from the perspective of clients who terminate. This study was designed to answer the question why do clients choose to terminate therapy prematurely. Qualitative methods were used. Twelve participants engaged in in depth one on one interviews. The interviews were transcribed and analyzed using Constructivist Grounded Theory methodology. In session and out of session behaviors by therapists were found to be the key reasons participants chose to end therapy. Experiencing invalidation rejection of a person's experiences emotions thoughts and perceptions invalidation of identity rejections based on a person's sexual identity invalidation of culture rejections based on a person's culture problems not being solved and not feeling valued by the therapist were key factors in participants decisions to terminate therapy. Immediate and long term consequences of these experiences including questioning sanity feeling anger feeling like a burden increased pain and despair prolonging of suffering and experiencing the loss of an important opportunity are also addressed. Implications and recommendations for theory research education practice and social work are discussed. The Effects of Expectancy Training, Commitment, and Therapeutic Conditions Upon Attrition from Outpatient Psychotherapy Joseph Richard Venema, 1970 The Effect of Therapist Experience on Psychotherapy Outcomes Scott Christopher Leon, 2002 The present study investigated the impact of a therapist's prior experience treating clients on outcomes for future clients with similar demographic and clinical characteristics. Prior research has consistently failed to demonstrate that therapists receiving more formal training and experience are more effective than therapists with less formal training and experience. However the literature has been criticized for its poor operationalization of training and experience. A review of the medical literature indicates that better operationalization of these variables might lead to effects previously not found and could lead to the development of optimal training conditions for psychotherapists. The samples for the current study were taken from a larger sample of 2 366 outpatients receiving psychotherapy from throughout the country. Pairs of patients were matched within therapists caseloads.

for demographic and clinical similarities but varied according to when they entered treatment Results indicated that the second patient in the matched pair achieved superior outcomes to the first patient in the matched pair only if the latter patient entered treatment shortly after the initial patient within 15 and 75 days These results indicate that under certain conditions therapists may become more effective with experience Future research should continue to improve prior methodologies to explore conditions necessary for therapists to learn from experience
