

The Toulmin Model of Argument

In his work on logic and argument, The Uses of Argument, Stephen Toulmin indicates three major, necessary parts of an argument, along with three additional, optional parts. The three major parts are the claim, the support, and the warrants.

Claim: This is the main point, the thesis, the controlling idea. The claim may be directly stated (usually at the first of a text, but sometimes at the end, especially for effect) or the claim may be implied. You can find the claim by asking the question, "What is the author trying to prove?"

Support: These are the reasons given in support of the claim; they are also known as evidence, proof, data, arguments, or grounds. The support of a claim can come in the form of facts and statistics, expert opinion, examples, explanations, and logical reasoning. You can find the support by asking, "What does the author say to persuade the reader of the claim?"

Warrants: These are the assumptions or presuppositions underlying the argument. Warrants are generally accepted beliefs and values, common ways our culture or society views things; because they are so commonplace, warrants are almost always unstated and implied. The author and audience may either share these beliefs, or the author's warrants may be in conflict with audience's generally held beliefs and cultural norms and values. Warrants are important because they are the "common ground" of author and audience; shared warrants invite the audience to participate by unconsciously supplying part of the argument. Warrants are also important because they provide the underlying reasons linking the claim and the support. You can infer the warrants by asking, "What's causing the author to say the things s/he does?" or "Where's the author coming from?"

Here's a visual representation and an example:

In this example, the claim that universities should reinstate affirmative action policies is supported by the reason that affirmative action provides equal access for all ethnic groups. It's generally acknowledged by most Americans that equality of access is a basic American value.

There are three additional parts to Toulmin's model of argument. Not every one of these is used in every argument, but only as need arises.

Qualifiers: Because argument is about probability and possibility, not about certainty, you should not use superlatives like all, every, absolutely or never, none, no one. Instead you may need to qualify (tone down) your claim with expressions like many, many times, some or rarely, few, possibly.

Rebuttal: When making an argument, you must take into consideration other conflicting viewpoints and deal with them fairly. You need to answer questions and objections raised in the

Uses of Argument Toulmin emphasized a number of points that are by now familiar but still deserve attention 1 Reasoning and argument involve not only support for points of view but also attack against them 2 Reasoning can have qualified conclusions 3 There are other good types of argument than those of standard formal logic 4 Unstated assumptions linking premisses to a conclusion are better thought of as inference licenses than as implicit premisses 5 Standards of reasoning can be field dependent and can be themselves the subject of argumentation Each of these points is illustrated by his layout of arguments The rebuttal illustrates the first point the qualifier the second point and the warrant and backing the last three points 2 RECEPTION OF TOULMIN'S BOOK As Toulmin himself notes in his essay in this volume which was delivered as an address in 2005 his fellow philosophers were initially hostile to the ideas in his book They were taken up however by specialists in fields like jurisprudence and psychology who found that they fit the forms of argument and reasoning that they were studying And Toulmin's model was embraced by the field of speech communication in the United States whose textbooks on argumentation now include an obligatory chapter on the Toulmin model of micro arguments An
