The Bubonic Plague Today

The young English princess disembarked her small ship and gazed upon the French town of Bordeaux. Her name was Joan, daughter of the powerful King Edward III, and she was on her way to wed the prince of Castile, Spain. Away from her family, she could now only look to the advisors with whom she traveled for guidance and comforting words. After her entourage arrived into port, she and her advisors were warned by the town mayor that the city was suffering from a sickness and that many inhabitants had died. For some unknown reason, the group of English royalty ignored the warnings of the mayor – an act that would prove to have fatal consequences. Within days, the castle was infected with the pestilence, and the young princess of merely fifteen could only watch as those closest to her fell ill to the plague and perished. Soon, the disease proved to be too much for Princess Joan as well, and on September 2, 1348 she too succumbed to the sickness that would eventually bear the name, the Black Death (Cantor 29).

Where has this epidemic gone? Did the sickness that attacked the Balkans in the sixth century, and again all of Europe in the fourteenth, simply disappear? The truth is that the pestilence, aptly named the Bubonic Plague, has indeed subsided, but by no means has it been eradicated (Miller 43). As statistical evidence shows that more and more unsuspecting people are infected each year, is the world giving this bacterium the attention it deserves? As time passes, it is becoming more evident that we as Americans are setting ourselves up for a devastating epidemic that could, in a matter of months, kill millions of people.
