Proceedings of the TLDI, 2005

Types in Compilation Robert Harper, 2003-06-29 The importance of typed languages for building robust software systems is by now an undisputed fact Years of research have led to languages with richly expressive yet easy to use type systems for high level programming languages Types provide not only a conceptual framework for language designers but also a good positive benefit to the programmer principally the ability to express and enforce levels of abstraction within a program Early compilers for typed languages followed closely the methods used for their untyped counterparts The role of types was limited to the earliest stages of compilation and they were thereafter ignored during the remainder of the translation process More recently however implementors have come to recognize the importance of types during compilation and even for object code Several advantages of types in compilation have been noted to date They support self checking by the compiler By tracking types during compilation it is possible for an internal type checker to detect translation errors at an early stage greatly facilitating compiler development They support certification of object code

By extending types to the generated object code it becomes possible for a code user to ensure the basic integrity of that code by checking its type consistency before execution. They support optimized data representations and calling conventions even in the presence of modularity. By passing types at compile link and even run time it is possible to avoid compromises of data representation imposed by untyped compilation techniques. Proceedings of the ...
